

Fragment 1: “Payment of a product always started out the same way: The buyer has a purchase necessity and the seller receives the request. Then, the clerk explains to the customer the ways of payment. It is not the best way of doing things, because it's always very repetitive, but that is the way it works.”

Fragment 2: “After customer chooses how he is going to pay, the clerk has to be very careful if the payment is made by credit card, as the buyer needs to be enter his code and insert his card on the machine, given to him by the seller.”

Fragment 3: “Much simpler, if cash is chosen, the seller just receives the payment from the buyer. After payment is completed, the seller finishes the sale and the customer receives the product.”